DANGEROUS RELICS .- A few days since Benj. Fisher, of the Star Foundry, bought a lot of iron, in which he found several shells, relics of the war. These he took out and laid away to one side. The cupols tender had never been a warrior, or at least knew nothing about the death-dealing missils of "red artillery." In charging the cupola one of these shells, or another that had not been observed. with other iron went into the furnace. As soon as it was hot, which wasn't long, it exploded. There was a speedy hegira from the moulding room, and there was no looking for coats or other light gear. As is generally the case in such occurrences, the men found that they had run way after all danger was past. An examination of the cupola showed ome slight injury to the lining, but nothing serious. The shell was quite a small one, as are also the balance that are left. Our toundry men are likely to secure considerable of such dangerous missiles, gathered up from the battle fields of the such merchandise.
